'Shahrukh Khan Pachaiyar Kadanthai'.A sheet of bomb-grade plutonium can be assembled into a bomb, then hidden inside a laptop — placing it in the range of the U.S. military, according to an independent analysis of the threat unveiled Friday. The plot, based on classified material leaked by Edward Snowden, highlights the chaos that has gripped the American security apparatus since the former National Security Agency contractor made his leaks public. "The risk posed by these leaks is as great today as it was when Snowden first began releasing classified documents to journalists at The Guardian and The Washington Post," the two newspapers now working together to report the leaks, said in a joint statement. The Washington Post reported Thursday night that it had become aware of information about the potential threat, which it said had been documented in a top-secret National Security Agency report circulated among intelligence officials. The report detailed methods for assembling the plutonium into a weapon, stashing the device in a laptop, and then bribing the right people to smuggle it into the United States. For now, the information about a potential threat contained in the "Top Secret/Sensitive Compartmented Information" report does not suggest any specific U.S. cities or abroad. "The report 'assesses' that the United States faces 'the prospect of a weapon of
