WebPlus X7, Serif.The position of the navicular bone in medial tibial stress syndrome. A cadaver study. Medial tibial stress syndrome (MTSS) is a problem that affects runners. The weight-bearing medial knee joint is constantly under a load, with a resultant effect on a number of structures within the knee joint, the foremost of which is the medial tibial plateau. A loss of medial tibial plateau height might contribute to the development of MTSS. The position of the navicular bone with reference to the other tibial plateau structures was measured on seventeen cadaveric tibiae.

The effect of liposomes with anionic phospholipids on the brain edema induced by i.p. injection of monosodium glutamate was investigated in adult rats.

Intraperitoneal injection of monosodium glutamate at a dose of 250 mg/kg, which produced a marked edema in the brain, resulted in a significant increase in the water content of the whole brain and increased the Gd-DTPA distribution in the brain.

Intravenous injection of liposomes with anionic phospholipids at a dose of 250 micrograms/kg significantly suppressed these effects. This protective effect was observed with the liposomes prepared from acidic phospholipids (palmitoyl, oleoyl and lignoceroyl) or from phosphatidylethanolamine, phosphatidylglycerol, phosphatidylserine, phosphatidylinositol, phosphatidylcholine and phosphatidylserine, but not with those prepared from dicalyglycerophosphatidylcholine or from phosphatidylcholine, suggesting the possibility that liposomes with acidic phospholipids may enter the brain through its blood-brain barrier and prevent monosodium glutamate from producing its edema effect.Katie Tardiff is seeking emergency medical attention after police say her ex-boyfriend allegedly followed her with a machete and stabbed her multiple times Katie Tardiff is seeking emergency
