The Economist is doing the right thing. Last week it started a 'dumping' campaign by removing their membership of the bank, created in 2007. This is a noble move. Even so, the following comments in the Jan 8th issue of the Economist illustrate an ignorance of banking and the argument that we have decided to give the benefits of a charity without the obligations. We propose that the entire banking system be transformed to a form more like what we have today in Sweden, Canada and the Netherlands. It will be a kind of competitive network of not-for-profit financial cooperatives to which individuals belong and where everyone accepts common rules that are proposed by a shared body of directors. A healthy banking system must have healthy competition, but it must also respect the savings of the people who make it up. The present system has neither. Credit cards, mortgages and interest-free student loans are all designed to give banks room to charge customers more. It takes more than interest rates, and much more than that, to make a healthy financial system. The first step is to make banking a public utility, not a privilege. Comments This article is not just a little ignorant of how banks operate, but it is also inaccurate. The universal banks in Sweden, Canada, the Netherlands do not have "more than healthy competition." In fact, the net is that they have little competition at all, as their wholesale operations are blocked out to the big banks in the other countries that make up the Eurozone. In addition, the only competition that exists is that which is imposed on the banks by the governmental agencies that are in charge of the supervision of the banking systems. Nor can there be much competition in the discount market, or you would see many discount banks closing their discount operations, because they don't have a competitive edge over the bigger discount banks. Nor do Sweden, Canada, and the Netherlands have healthy competition in the mortgage market, especially in the U.S. The present housing market and the mortgage market in the U.S. are dominated by government sponsored organizations, especially Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. A good source for information on the U.S. mortgage market is "Likewise, if you look at how much banks borrow, you'll see that they'd save a considerable amount if they had their capital ratios at levels similar to those in Sweden, Canada and the Netherlands. It's one of the reasons they don't:

In a high-volume, low-time frame environment, and where information is supplied, and decisions are made, asynchronously, what is the best way to achieve a given goal? The examples we all experience daily, show that at any given moment, things change and there are only so many resources available. In order to create an environment, and a process that is resilient, it is important to have in place the tools, and the concepts, to drive the evolutionary, high-velocity, low-time, near-constant, feedback, and streamlined decision-making process. So, what are these tools? The first, and most important, tool is being a validator. In other words, being the most informed person in the room. The most informed person in the room means that: • You are listening, and taking in all the information and using this information, as efficiently as possible, to make a decision • You are not distracting others • You are not purposely or unintentionally influencing others to influence a decision, and • You are making a decision based on all available information that is relevant to the current situation or the decision. When you consider that you might be adding an additional person to the team, and that person happens to be the best in the room, you are placing yourself in a position where you can make the best decision. There are tools that can make this decision making process easier. One of the most important tools, and one that has been oft-overlooked, is the ability to track the causes of failures. If you are not able to track the causes of failures, you have no ability to learn or fix the problem. In the case of a web or mobile application, the first step in troubleshooting is tracking down a failing use case or feature. The next step is to track the impacts that this failing use case or feature is having on the business processes. The third step is to track and measure all of the links that are responsible for a feature's failure. When you follow these three steps, you are able to evaluate at the end of the process, how and what caused the failure, who is responsible for fixing the problem, and what caused the problem to occur in the first place. The last tool that is needed to achieve efficient decision-making is a historical repository of events. This repository has events that you are aware of, are using
