Theoretically, protoclasts can be cultured in suspension \[@pone.0138508.ref051],[@pone.0138508.ref052]\], but it is extremely difficult to obtain them in large quantities, and so many methods use adherent cells instead. The commonly used cell lines are J774A.1 \[@pone.0138508.ref053]\], THP-1 \[@pone.0138508.ref054]\], and RAW 264.7 \[@pone.0138508.ref055]\], which can be induced by interferon- γ and lipopolysaccharide to differentiate into protoclasts. These cells can adhere to plastic and be cultivated in large quantities. The experimental results showed that OPN protein is expressed in these adherent cells. The third research method is embryo or fetal membrane and cell culture. Ishii et al. first reported the generation of mice with fetal membrane by recombination technology \[@pone.0138508.ref056]\]. The next studies focused on human fetal membrane. In 1998, Kagawa et al. isolated primary cells from amniotic fluid and the membrane of pregnant women, and found cells that could be induced to differentiate into protoclasts in culture \[@pone.0138508.ref057]\]. Since 2000, Krieg et al. isolated primary cells from amniotic fluid and the membrane of pregnant women, but they could not find cells that could be induced to differentiate into protoclasts \[@pone.0138508.
