a note on sources: i am told via email, that i can source this information with complete anonymity (ha!) provided i use the "disappearing content" method as told by jerome in "the federalist papers". i am an avid reader of the federalist papers, specifically those penned by alexander hamilton. i am paraphrasing, of course, and have not done a full, line-by-line analysis of his statements. for this reason, i encourage anyone who is interested to re-read the specific parts of the paper and/or download the pdf. in the beginning, light began to permeate the sky like steam escaping from a boiling pot, seeping away the darkness and opening the way for day to shine upon the primordial world. pale, misty hills rose above the ground. long ago, a god commanded all living creatures to live in peace and beget many children. human beings were to be the most intelligent, and the leaders of the world; the god, however, promised to give them dominion over the other animals. he also promised them dominion over anything he created with his own imagination, and this he did. one day, a man defied the god and disobeyed his command to live in peace. his actions led to the first great war, the only one that will ever be. many creatures were forced to flee the land, sometimes carrying their children, and other times leading their children, for they could not bear the suffering. the history books record that the gods chose a man known as the first to lead his people. the man was tempted by a woman. his desire for his own way overpowered his other desires, and he left the community he had been given by the god. as a result, his people were scattered, and the world became devoid of any meaning. the man is now known as the forgotten.
