the situation was quite different with indian versions. in 1993, a company called indocar initiated a bangla font program for windows called indocar bangla. the program provided its users with a bangla font including several types such as the bold, italic, bold italic, monochrome, black and white. it was a valuable contribution to the bangla community. its look, feel and capability were quite similar to proshika shabda. the company was later on bought by the public owned organization, bangla computer and software limited. later, it was bought by the government owned organization, bangladesh computer & software corporation (bcsc) in 1996. the font was rebranded as proshika. proshika's license was acquired by cds india which was later on bought by infosys in 1997. proshika for windows became the official bangla font for windows 97. but this could not bring any significant change in the market share as the other bangla fonts were now able to match proshika shabda in terms of look and feel. one of the earliest add-ons was proshika bengali, a bangla font that came out in 1995. this was followed by kaloala and kaloala-proshika in 1996. both were developed by the computer science department of the university of dhaka (u.d.c.). bangla dakhin, also developed by u.c, came out in 1997. a bangla font program was released by the public owned organization, bangladesh computer and software corporation (bcsc) in 1998 named proshika. it was developed by computer science and engineering department of the university of dhaka. in 2001, the college of computer and information science of the university of dhaka (ccisd) developed sukhai. proshika is still used for windows. but the fonts being used in linux and mac are the other bangla fonts being discussed here.
